He wished nothing had happened. Once again, he felt that there were certain things which/that could never happen, no matter how simple (they might have been) ...It would have been so easy to be Marcela's friend. Who knows, it could/might/would have been too much all of a sudden. He was a bit surprised. How could somebody who was Marcella's brother still be interested in such strange and insignificant things? Only somebody who would/might have narrated a novel instead of telling him every detail of her childhood and her memories, what streets she used to/would play on, what gardens she used to/would wander through...
